ALBERTO R. GONZALES, Attorney General,

Petitioner,

LEROY CARHART, M.D., WILLIAM G. FITZHUGH, M.D., WILLIAM H. KNORR, M.D., and JILL L. VIBHAKAR, M.D., on behalf of themselves and the patients they serve, Respondents.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE EIGHTH CIRCUIT

MOTION FOR LEAVE TO FILE BRIEF AMICI CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF RESPONDENTS IN RELATED CASE

On February 21, 2006, this Court granted certiorari in Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380, to review the judgment of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit striking down the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, Pub. L. No. 108-105, 117 Stat. 1201 ("Act").

Gonzales v. Carhart raises the same constitutional questions, concerns the same Act of Congress, involves the same petitioner, and will be argued on the same day as the instant case. Furthermore, the information and arguments presented in the brief amici curiae are equally relevant to both cases.

Petitioner Gonzales has consented to the filing of this brief amici curiae in the instant case, and will not be prejudiced in any way by the granting of this Motion, as Petitioner has the opportunity to respond to this brief in his Reply Brief.

For these reasons, amici curiae request that the Court grant them leave to file a jointly-captioned brief in support of respondents, and direct the Clerk to accept this brief out-of-time in Gonzales v. Carhart, No. 05-380, and to docket the brief in both cases.

Respectfully submitted,

Dated: September 20, 2006

INTEREST OF AMICI CURIAE

Amici are religious organizations, religiously affiliated organizations, and individual clergy and theologians dedicated to preserving religious freedom for all persons and, within this context, to ensuring that abortion laws protect a woman's right to act according to her religious beliefs and conscience in this most private, personal decision. The statements of interest provided by individual organizations, representatives, and individuals included in Appendix A to this brief demonstrate the varied and sometimes evolving perspectives on abortion of amici and illustrate our point that, for religious reasons that include a responsibility to protect the health of women, many denominations oppose undue restrictions on abortion. Indeed, respect for human life and health is a core value for many religions, including all of the religions represented by amici. A full listing of the organizations and individuals signing this brief as amici curiae appears in Appendix B.

Because protecting the health of women is a core expression of the religious values of amici, amici agree that all women whose health is at risk should be free to seek the safest medical treatment, without governmental coercion or constraint, in making the difficult decision whether to terminate a pregnancy. Other religious traditions and organizations also give primacy to women's health and conscience, as we will show.

Adherence to these principles, which are based on religious beliefs, compels amici to support Respondents in this case.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

As people of faith, amici urge the Court to recognize the abundance of religious voices speaking out against the failure of the Partial Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003 (the "Act") to protect women's health, and not to oversimplify the issue before the Court as one of morality versus immorality. Rather, amici urge the Court to heed the mandate of Casey "to define the liberty of all, not to mandate [its] own moral code." Planned Parenthood of Se. Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833, 850 (1992).

Both historically and currently, many religious organizations have given their support to abortion where necessary to protect women's health and, in such circumstances, support a woman's right to the method of abortion that will best protect her health. Internationally, even democracies with either a state religion or a single religious majority have abortion laws that protect women's health. Before this Court's decision in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), many Protestant, Jewish, Unitarian Universalist and other clergy and lay people felt it was a religious imperative to support legal abortion as a means of protecting women from dangerous "back alley" procedures. This religious mandate did not end with Roe. Rather, many of these religious groups and individuals continue to advocate for legislation that protects women's health.

In light of this diversity of opinion within the U.S. and in the international religious community, amici urge the Court not to allow Congress to force a moral consensus, but rather to let the individual women who face the agonizing decision of whether to terminate a pregnancy or risk their own health do so legally, in consultation and accordance with their own conscience and faith.

ARGUMENT

I. HISTORICALLY, THERE HAS BEEN NO
CONSENSUS AMONG AMERICAN
RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS
CONCERNING REPRODUCTIVE FREEDOM.

It is the position of amici that the history of religious conversations on the subject of governmental regulation of reproduction is illuminating and of assistance to this Court. While it may sometimes seem as if a single religious point of view on these matters exists, a historical analysis demonstrates the complexity and multiplicity of religious thought about reproductive rights. Inquiry into two main epochs of transformation in the law of abortion—the time of criminalization efforts during the nineteenth century, and the time around this Court's decision to protect the right of abortion in Roe—indicates that public religious discourse on reproductive control has been, alternatively, either notably spare or multiple and plural. Fundamentally, such an inquiry demonstrates that there simply has been no single moral consensus on the issue of reproductive decision-making. And, indeed, while we as Americans may well be familiar with critiques of reproductive rights in the name of religion, it is important to recall that this country has likewise seen defense of these rights by religious institutions that have over time professed their belief in an individual's freedom to exercise her conscience on the matter of abortion.

In the nineteenth century, the medical profession—and not religious groups—spearheaded a movement to expand the scope of anti-abortion regulation (which had previously permitted abortion prior to fetal quickening). See James C. Mohr, Abortion in America: The Origins and Evolution of National Policy, 1800-1900, at 20-45, 147-70 (Oxford University Press 1978); Laurence H. Tribe, Abortion: The Clash of Absolutes 30-31 (W.W. Norton & Company 1992). The anti-abortion stance of medical practitioners was often grounded in offensive ideology—specifically, in the notion that the prevalence of abortion (particularly among well-to-do American women) was diminishing the native population and thereby threatening the 'ethnic purity' of the nation. See, e.g., Horatio R. Storer & Franklin Fiske Heard, Criminal Abortion: Its Nature, Its Evidence, and Its Law 47-54 (Boston, Little, Brown, and Company 1868).

Generally, "the support offered by organized religion" to the medical community's anti-abortion efforts "was surprisingly limited." MOHR, ABORTION IN AMERICA at 185. Moreover, when some religious persons or groups waded into the anti-abortion discourse, they often invoked the same offensive ideological reasoning as physicians did. For example, the sparse public opposition to abortion by Protestant clergy carried nativist undertones, and was an outgrowth of fear of population decline relative to growing Catholic communities. See, e.g., HORACE KNAPP, WOMAN'S CONFIDENTIAL ADVISER ON THE HEALTH AND DISEASES OF WOMEN 78-79 (Providence 1873).

While in the 1800s religious groups had remained for the most part disengaged from the campaign to expand the illegality of abortion, just prior to this Court's decision in Roe they were relatively vocal about the abortion issue. But, it is important to note, around the time of Roe there was no straightforward or easy consensus on reproductive rights. Indeed, some religious groups (even prior to Roe and in the face of abortion's illegality) argued for reproductive freedom. These arguments were based on at least two principles: the sanctity of the life and health of the woman in the face of dangerous and illegal abortion procedures; and this nation's founding principle of religious freedom and the right to act according to one's own moral judgment.

The most noteworthy example of religious support for legal abortion came in 1967 (six years before this Court's watershed decision protecting the abortion right), when twenty-two clergy founded the Clergy Consultation Service on Abortion. See David P. Cline, Creating Choice: A Community Responds to the Need for Abortion and Birth Control, 1961-1973, at 5-7 (Palgrave Macmillan 2006); Tom Davis, Sacred Work: Planned Parenthood and Its Clergy Alliances 2-3 (Rutgers University Press 2005).

In the years prior to Roe, women seeking to have abortions faced substantial dangers to their lives and health. Strikingly, pre-Roe, illegal abortions resulted in approximately 100,000 hospital admissions annually (for complications such as hemorrhaging). Theodore Irwin, The New Abortion Laws: How Are They Working?, TODAY'S HEALTH, Mar. 1970, at 21, 21. And, during this time, abortions were the "major cause" of maternal death. Id. For example, by the early 1960s, although they "were almost completely preventable," "abortion-related deaths accounted for nearly half, or 42.1 percent, of . . . total maternal mortality" in New York City. LESLIE J. REAGAN, WHEN ABORTION WAS A CRIME: WOMEN, MEDICINE, AND LAW IN THE UNITED STATES, 1867-1973, at 211, 214 (University of California Press 1997). In the face of these significant dangers from illegal abortions, many clergy were motivated to act to protect women's lives and health.

The Clergy Consultation Service on Abortion sought to protect women by offering counseling and making abortion referrals to safe practitioners. Participating clergy expressed their concern for women in the Service's statement of purpose:

The present abortion laws require over a million women in the United States each year to seek illegal abortions which often cause severe mental anguish, physical suffering, and unnecessary death of women. . . .

Belief in the sanctity of human life certainly demands helpfulness and sympathy to women in trouble. . . .

Therefore believing as clergymen that there are higher laws and moral obligations transcending legal codes, we believe that it is our pastoral responsibility and religious duty to give aid and assistance to all women with problem pregnancies.

DAVIS, SACRED WORK at 129 (quoting HOWARD MOODY & ARLENE CARMEN, ABORTION COUNSELING at 30-31 (Judson Press 1973)).

As the Service's mission statement suggests, by the time of Roe, a significant inversion had taken place. If in the nineteenth century a woman's body had been perceived as an object to be regulated for the purpose of protecting the presumed 'ethnic integrity' of the body politic, during the pivotal time around Roe a train of religious discourse attended to women's own physical suffering—and to the corresponding urgency of liberalizing abortion laws.

Finally, in the time of Roe, the desire to protect women did not alone motivate clergy. The clergy also advocated in favor of the legality of abortion on the basis of this nation's fundamental guarantee of religious freedom and in the name of religious pluralism. As E. Spencer Parsons, a minister who served as Chairman of the Chicago Clergy Consultation Service on Problem Pregnancies, stated in a 1971 address:

Physicians, social workers and clergymen should enjoy the freedom of being able to give counsel and information on matters of family health and welfare without being subject to arrest for conspiring to commit an illegal act which is morally a matter of private conscience

[S]ince we are a people representing many diverse religious traditions, is it not the best public policy, out of respect for our different convictions on the matter, for the State to withdraw from regulating this area of human intimacy?

E. Spencer Parsons, Abortion: A Private and Public Concern, 10 CRITERION 2 (Winter 1971).

In sum, far from being in agreement as to the morality of abortion, members of the religious community have held diverse views on the issue historically, and a number of groups have worked to perfect reproductive freedom.

II. THERE IS NO CONSENSUS TODAY AMONG RELIGIOUS COMMUNITIES THAT ABORTION REGULATIONS SHOULD NOT PROTECT THE HEALTH OF THE WOMAN.

Religious communities today represent a diversity of opinion as to the question currently before the court—i.e., whether an exception for the health of the woman is required for legislation criminalizing abortion procedures that many doctors believe are the safest for some women.² Many Protestant, Jewish, and Unitarian Universalist organizations support a woman's right to make a decision about abortion in consultation with her doctors and without undue government interference; many others support abortion where necessary to preserve the life or health of the woman. In fact, in recent years in the United States, these groups and individuals have actively fought against legislation—such as the Act—that fails to protect the life or health of the woman.

This plurality of religious opinion is a testament to the intensely personal nature of the decision to terminate a pregnancy. The Act, which strips women of the ability to make crucial decisions about their health and well-being in consultation with their doctors, is an undue government intrusion into a woman's personal, religious, or moral sphere.

² The Act at issue bans procedures from as early as 12 to 14 weeks gestation.

A. Many Religions Support A Woman's Right To Make Reproductive Decisions Without Government Interference.

For many people of faith, freedom to make decisions of conscience without government interference is consistent with their deeply held religious convictions. The Central Conference of American Rabbis, for example, has reaffirmed that the "decision concerning any abortion must be made by the woman and not by the state or any other external agency." 91st Annual Convention of the Central Conference of American Rabbis Pittsburgh Pennsylvania, June 23-26, 1980 (on file with Religious Coalition for Reproductive Choice ("RCRC")).

The Episcopal Church has stated its "unequivocal" opposition to any government act that "abridges the right of a woman to reach an informed decision about the termination of pregnancy." General Convention Statement on Childbirth and Abortion, Journal of the General Convention of the Episcopal Church 1994, at 324 (General Convention 1995), available at http://www.episcopalarchives.org/cgi-bin/acts_new/acts_resolution-complete.pl?resolution=1994-A054 [hereinafter 1994 General Convention Statement].

While in 1997 the 72nd General Convention of the Episcopal Church expressed "grave concern" about the use of the "intact dilation and extraction" procedure—which is only one of the procedures banned by the Act—in the third trimester of pregnancy, it made an exception for "extreme situations." It did not change its comprehensive 1994 resolution opposing "any legislative, executive or judicial action limiting decision-making on or access to abortion." General Convention, Journal of the General Convention of ... The Episcopal Church, Philadelphia, 1997, at 270

(New York: General Convention, 1998), available at http://www.episcopalarchives.org/cgibin/acts/acts resolution.pl?resolution=1997-D065.

Additionally, the General Convention stated in 1994,

We therefore express our deep conviction that any proposed legislation on the part of national or state governments regarding abortions must take special care to see that the individual conscience is respected, and that the responsibility of individuals to reach informed decisions on this matter is acknowledged and honored as the position of this Church.

1994 General Convention Statement, at 324.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church in America stated that "there can be sound reasons for ending a pregnancy through induced abortion. . . . We recognize that conscientious decisions need to be made in relation to difficult circumstances that vary greatly." Churchwide Assembly on the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, Social Teaching Statement on Abortion (1991), available at http://www.elca.org/socialstatements/abortion.

Recognizing the plurality of opinion on the issue of abortion even within its own membership, the Presbyterian Church (USA) ("PCUSA") stated that, " the decision regarding abortion must remain with the individual, to be made on the basis of conscience and personal religious principles, and free from governmental interference." Covenant and Creation: Theological Reflections on Contraception and Abortion, Minutes of the 195th General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, at 369 (1983) (on file with RCRC).

This Church's current statement recognizes the "intensely personal" nature of the decision to terminate a pregnancy and the role religion must play in that decision:

Humans are empowered by the spirit prayerfully to make significant moral choices, including the choice to continue or end a pregnancy. Human choices should not be made in a moral vacuum, but must be based on Scripture, faith, and Christian ethics. For any choice, we are accountable to God; however, even when we err, God offers to forgive us.

PCUSA, Statement on Post-Viability and Late-Term Abortion (2006), available at http://www.pcusa.org/overture2004-10/postviabilitystatement.pdf.

The National Association of Evangelicals, which "deplores in the strongest possible terms" legalization of abortion for "personal convenience or sociological considerations," nevertheless has held a position since 1973 that states:

At the same time, we recognize the necessity for therapeutic abortions to safeguard the health or the life of the mother, as in the case of tubular pregnancies. Other pregnancies, such as those resulting from rape or incest may require deliberate termination, but the decision should be made only after there has been medical, psychological and religious counseling of the most sensitive kind.

National Association of Evangelicals, Abortion (1973), available at, http://www.nae.net/index.cfm?FUSEACTION=editor.page

B. Many Religions Support Abortion Where Necessary To Protect The Life Or Health Of The Woman.

Respect for human life and health is a core value for many religions, including all of the religions represented by amici. For some faiths, this value is paramount and requires that a woman be able to obtain an abortion when her health or life is at risk. For other faiths, a woman considers her health as one of several factors in making her personal decision about her pregnancy. For women of all of these faiths, restrictions on access to abortion (and, in particular, criminal statutes) that do not provide an exception for the health of the woman not only risk women's health but threaten their religious values.

The PCUSA offered another view in its official statement issued in 2006. The statement underscores the complexity of religious and moral views about abortion as individuals and denominations seek to discern God's will and to consider the life and health of both the woman and her fetus:

In cases where problems of life or health of the mother arise in a pregnancy, the church supports efforts to protect the life and health of both the mother and the baby. When late-term pregnancies must be terminated, we urge decisions intended to deliver the baby alive.

217th General Assembly of PCUSA, Overture 26 On Late-Term Pregnancy (2006), available at http://www.pcusa.org/ga217/business/overtures/ ovt2605.htm.

The United Methodist Church, recognizing the "tragic conflicts of life with life" that certain women face, has concluded that "continuance of a pregnancy which endangers the life or health of the mother, or poses other serious problems concerning the life, health, or mental capability of the child to be, is not a moral necessity. In such cases, we believe the path of mature Christian judgment may indicate the advisability of abortion." THE BOOK OF RESOLUTIONS OF THE UNITED METHODIST CHURCH 44, 129 (The United Methodist Publishing House 2004) (on file with RCRC).

Speaking specifically to the intact dilation and extraction procedure (which is only one of the procedures banned by the Act), the United Methodist Church's position states, "We oppose the use of late-term abortion known as dilation and extraction (partial-birth abortion) and call for the end of this practice except when the physical life of the mother is in danger and no other medical procedure is available, or in the case of severe fetal anomalies incompatible with life." Id. at 161. Thus, the United Methodist Church, while clearly concerned about the moral implications of intact dilation and extraction, supports exceptions for severe fetal anomalies incompatible with life and for certain circumstances when no other procedure is available; both of these exceptions are missing from the Act.

For many Jewish women, access to abortion where necessary to protect the life or health of the woman is a religious dictate. The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism stated in 1991 that, "under special circumstances, Judaism chooses and requires abortion as an act which affirms and protects the life, well being and health of the mother. . . ." United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism Resolution on Abortion, Passed at 1991 Biennial Convention, available at http://www.uscj.org/SocPolAbortion_Contr5481.html.

For women of faiths that encourage prayerful consideration of a woman's health, or in fact mandate that a woman's health be preserved, the Act's lack of a health exception is religiously intolerable. The Act leaves no room for such women to make highly personal decisions about their health in consultation with their faith and in accordance with their religious values. Rather, the Act legislates one moral path as the path for all women.

C. Many Religious Organizations And Individuals Have Fought Against Legislation That Risks Women's Health.

Religious groups and people of faith have consistently fought against abortion legislation that threatens the health of the woman.

The Religious Coalition for Reproductive Choice, which represents a great diversity of religious and theological organizations, institutions, and individuals, has fought vigorously at both the state and federal level to uphold Casey and ensure that abortion regulations protect the life and health of the woman, including the ability to obtain procedures that physicians believe best protect a woman's health. See, e.g., RCRC, Our Mission: A Message from Reverend Carlton W. Veazey, President and CEO, available at http://www.rcrc.org/about/index.cfm; RCRC, Statement of the Board of Directors on Campaign to Ban Abortion and "Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Bill" (June 4, 2003) (on file with RCRC); Letters from RCRC to U.S. Senators (Sept. 17, 1998) (on file with RCRC); Letter from RCRC to President William Jefferson Clinton (Apr. 29, 1996) (on file with RCRC) [hereinafter 1996 RCRC Letter to President Clinton].

In 1996, seventy-one Protestant, Jewish, Unitarian Universalist, and other religious leaders signed a letter of support for President Clinton's veto of Congressional legislation that would have banned the dilation and extraction procedure, without exception for the life or health of the woman. The letter set forth the religious leaders' conviction that each woman who is faced with such difficult moral decisions must be free to decide how to respond, in consultation with her doctor, her family, and her God. Neither we as religious leaders, nor the president, nor Congress—none of us—can discern God's will as well as the woman herself. . . .

1996 RCRC Letter to President Clinton; see also Laurie Goodstein, Religious Leaders Back Abortion Ban Veto, The Washington Post, Apr. 30, 1996, at A4 (noting close to thirty original signatories to letter).

Individual women of different faiths also stepped forward in support of President Clinton's 1996 veto by sharing publicly their agonizing decisions, when faced with grave threats to their health and hopeless diagnoses for the fetuses they were carrying, to undergo the intact D&E procedure, which would be banned by the Act. President William Jefferson Clinton, Remarks by the President on House Resolution 1833 (Apr. 10, 1996) (on file with RCRC).

Among them was Coreen Costello, who described herself and her husband as "very, very much pro-life, conservative Republicans." Id. at 3. Mrs. Costello learned when she was seven months pregnant that the fetus she was carrying was suffering from polyhydramnia, which also severely threatened Mrs. Costello's health. Mrs. Costello explained her painful decision about her daughter:

She was dying and she would likely not survive any labor and there was no way I could deliver her. We had her baptized in utero. We named her Katherine Grace. We then realized that our only safe option was the procedure that . . . is being attempted to be outlawed.

Id.

Mary-Dorothy Line, who described herself and her husband as "practicing Catholics," shared how she learned, nineteen weeks into her pregnancy, that the fetus she was carrying had hydrocephalus, and how she had no option but to terminate the pregnancy.

This was not our choice, for not only was our son going to die, but the complications of the pregnancy put my health in danger, as well. If I carried to term, he might die in utero, and the resulting toxins could cause a hemorrhage and possibly a hysterectomy. The hydrocephaly also meant that a natural labor risked rupturing my cervix and my uterus.

Id. at 2.

In 1998, notwithstanding the efforts of these religious individuals and organizations, a bill similar to that vetoed by President Clinton in 1996 was introduced and passed in both the Senate and House of Representatives. President Clinton vetoed the 1998 bill, again citing its lack of an exception to protect the life or health of the woman. And, again, religious groups supported the President's veto.

For example, the Office for Church and Society of the United Church of Christ fought to sustain President Clinton's 1998 veto, by stating to the United States Senate the "overwhelming religious consensus within our church":

Let the church and the religious community offer its advice on this issue, advice to the women facing the choice. Let the medical community offer its advice. But keep the government out of it. Protect the fundamental religious responsibility of a woman to make this decision about her own body and her own responsibility for the developing life within her.

Rev. Dr. Jay Lintner, Statement on Partial-Birth Abortions Urging the Senate To Sustain President Clinton's Veto of H.R. 1122 (Sept. 17, 1998) (on file with RCRC).

Mark J. Pelavin, Associate Director of the Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism, issued a statement on September 17, 1998, on behalf of 870 congregations, 1,880 rabbis, and 1.5 million Reform Jews in support of President Clinton's veto. The statement read, in part, "Women are capable of making moral decisions, often in consultation with their clergy, families and physicians, on whether or not to have an abortion. We believe that religious matters are best left to religious communities, not politicians." Press Release, Religious Action Center of Reform Judaism, Statement of Mark J. Pelavin (Sept. 17, 1998) (on file with RCRC).

Claudia Crown Ades, a Jewish woman, shared the "spiritual journey" that started when she learned that the fetus she was carrying had the fatal chromosomal disorder Trisomy 13, and that the pregnancy posed a serious threat to her health, as well. Press Release, RCRC, Statement of Claudia Crown Ades (Sept. 17, 1998) (on file with RCRC).

Our baby's brain was filled with fluid that prevented further development. He had a seriously malformed heart with a hole between the chambers hindering normal blood flow. A giant cyst, filled with intestinal matter, formed on the outside of his chest. He had hyperteloric eyes and much, much more. Our baby stood zero chance of survival.

Id.

In consultation with her doctors, her family, and God, Mrs. Ades decided to terminate her pregnancy to preserve her health and end the suffering of the fetus she was carrying. For her, it was a religious decision: "I believe that my instinct [to request an unscheduled ultrasound] was God's way of letting me know that my son wasn't meant to come into this world and that he was suffering inside me and dying. God showed me a way to end his suffering." Id.

In 2001, Maureen Mary Britell, a Catholic woman who, before 1994, "never thought I could imagine a reason why a woman would ever have an abortion," shared her agonizing story in a letter to members and supporters of the National Abortion Federation. Letter from Maureen Mary Britell (June 12, 2001) (on file with RCRC). In 1994, five months into her pregnancy, Mrs. Britell discovered that the fetus she was carrying suffered from the fatal anomaly anencephaly and had developed a brain stem but no brain.

Id. In order to protect Mrs. Britell's health, the doctors recommended an induction abortion whereby Mrs. Britell's labor would be induced and the umbilical cord cut upon delivery, thus allowing the fetus to die after delivery. Id. Mrs. Britell wrote about how she struggled with the decision:

I am a Catholic and the idea of ending my pregnancy was beyond my imagination. I turned to my parish priest for guidance. He counseled me for a long time, and in the end, he agreed that there was nothing more I could do to help my daughter. With the support of our families and our priest, [my husband] and I made the decision to end the pregnancy.

Id.

Mrs. Britell's doctors induced her labor as planned, but there were complications, and the doctors had to cut the umbilical cord while the fetus was still in the birth canal, in order to avoid serious health complications for Mrs. Britell. This "partial birth abortion" was necessary to preserve Mrs. Britell's health, and it would be outlawed under the Act. Id.

In each of these instances, religious organizations, leaders, and individuals fought against legislation which did not adequately safeguard the lives and health of women, and they did so in consultation with—and in many cases compelled by—their religious beliefs.

D. Many Religious Democracies Abroad Recognize The Importance Of Safeguarding Women's Health.

This Court has often looked to the experiences of other nations to illuminate the nature of individual rights. See, e.g., Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551, 576 (2005) (citing global condemnation of capital punishment for juvenile offenders); Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 573 (2003) (citing European and British law to clarify the values of Western civilization and of Judeo-Christian moral and ethical standards). Of particular significance here is the fact that many democracies with either a state religion or a strong religious majority have enacted abortion laws with exceptions to protect the health of the woman.

According to a study by the United Nations of abortion law and policy, Protestant and Orthodox Christian countries overwhelmingly approve of protecting the health and life of the pregnant woman. U.N. Dep't of Econ. & Soc. Affairs Population Div., Abortion Policies A Global Review Volume I Afghanistan to France, U.N. Doc. ST/ESA/SER.A/187, U.N. Sales No. E.01.XIII.10 (2001); U.N. Dep't of Econ. & Soc. Affairs Population Div., Abortion Policies A Global Review Volume II Gabon to Norway, U.N. Doc. ST/ESA/SER.A/191, U.N. Sales No. E.01.XIII.18 (2001); U.N. Dep't of Econ. & Soc. Affairs Population Div., Abortion Policies A Global Review Volume III Oman to Zimbabwe, U.N. Doc. ST/ESA/SER.A/196, U.N. Sales No. E.02.XIII.5 (2001). Available at http://www.un.org/esa/population/publications/abortion/ [hereinafter United Nations Study].

The law of the United Kingdom permits abortion after 24 weeks gestation to protect the health or life of the woman, or if the fetus is severely handicapped. Human Fertilisation and Embryology Act, 1990, c. 37, § 37 (U.K.). The Church of England has stated that "there can be strictly limited conditions under which [abortion] may be morally preferable", and Anglicans "may come to different conclusions about the proper course of action in particular cases." The Church of England, Abortion: A Briefing Paper, (2005), available at http://www.cofe.anglican.org/info/socialpublic/abortion.ht ml.

Furthermore, despite the Vatican's comprehensive ban on abortion, the majority of Catholic countries permit abortion when it is necessary to protect the health or life of the pregnant woman.³ See, e.g., Gazz. Uff. Della Repubblica Italiana, Part I, 2 May 1978, No. 140, pp. 3642-3646 (Italy) (abortion may be performed after the first 90 days if a serious threat to the woman's physical or mental health has been diagnosed); Law No. 11179, 21 December 1984, Cód. Pen., Artículo 86 (Arg.) (although generally prohibited, abortion to prevent harm to the woman's life or health is not punishable); see generally United Nations Study; Harvard Law School, Abortion Laws of the World, Annual Review of Population Law, http://annualreview.law.harvard.edu/annual_review.htm (last visited Aug. 11, 2006).

Israel also approves of abortion on broad medical grounds, including the protection of the health or life of the woman. United Nations Study. And eleven Islamic nations (Algeria, Azerbaijan, Bahrain, Jordan, Kyrgyzstan, Malaysia, Morocco, Tajikistan, Tunisia, Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan) permit abortions to protect the health or life of the pregnant woman. Id.

These countries represent a diversity of political and religious positions, but they share an ability to integrate principles of faith with a state interest in regulating abortion in such a way as to protect both the health and the life of a pregnant woman.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the Court should affirm the decisions of the United States Courts of Appeal for the Eighth and Ninth Circuits.

APPENDIX A: STATEMENTS OF INTEREST OF THE AMICI CURIAE

AMERICAN JEWISH COMMITTEE

The American Jewish Committee (AJC), a national organization of approximately 150,000 members and supporters, was founded in 1906 to protect the civil and religious rights of Jews. AJC believes that this goal can best be achieved by preserving the constitutional rights of all Americans, including the fundamental right of access to abortion. For this reason, AJC firmly believes that when faced with reproductive health decisions – often in the context of wanted pregnancies gone tragically wrong – women and their families, in consultation with their doctors and in accordance with their religious beliefs, must be able to choose the medical procedure that is safest for the woman and best protects her ability to bear future children.

AMERICANS FOR RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Americans for Religious Liberty (ARL) is a nonprofit interfaith educational organization, founded in 1982, to defend church-state separation, freedom of conscience, and reproductive choice. ARL has been before this Court numerous times as an amicus, including in cases defending reproductive choice.

ANTI-DEFAMATION LEAGUE

The Anti-Defamation League (ADL), founded in 1913, is a national Jewish human relations organization dedicated to principles of religious and individual liberty, including the right to privacy. ADL views reproductive choice as an issue of personal and religious freedom. Accordingly, ADL believes that a woman's right to make her own decision concerning abortion is constitutionally protected and should be made in accordance with her own religious and moral convictions, without governmental intrusion. ADL has participated as amicus curiae in numerous cases before the Supreme Court and other courts when these issues have been implicated, including Ayotte v. Planned Parenthood of Northern New England (2006); Stenberg v. Carhart (2000); Planned Parenthood v. Casey (1992); and Webster v. Reproductive Health Services (1989).

DISCIPLES FOR CHOICE

Disciples for Choice is an organization of members of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) who support reproductive choice. The organization endeavors to maintain the freedom of every woman to decide when to bear children according to her own conscience and religious belief, without governmental interference. Disciples for Choice holds high the dignity of women as responsible decision makers. It also recognizes the diverse approaches to the issue of reproductive choice among faith groups and religious denominations. The spectrum of views as to when abortion may be morally justified supports the conviction that the individual must make the abortion decision utilizing the guidance of personal faith and counsel.

DISCIPLES JUSTICE ACTION NETWORK

Disciples Justice Action Network (DJAN), founded in 1996 in Chicago, Illinois, is a 501(c)(3) tax-exempt organization. DJAN counts some 2,000 supporters and its fast-growing constituency is made up of churches, other justice issue groups and individuals. DJAN strongly supports women's reproductive rights. The Gospel envisions a society in which all are free from oppression, despair, poverty, violence and marginalization. Women's lives and health must be given paramount consideration in abortion-related decisions. Banning abortion procedures with no exception for the health of the woman would conflict with DJAN's religious principals and values.

EPISCOPAL WOMEN'S CAUCUS

The Episcopal Church, acting through its legislative body, the General Convention, has on numerous occasions since 1967 affirmed the right of every pregnant woman, preferably in consultation with a member of the clergy, to make her own decision about whether to carry a pregnancy to term and has unequivocally opposed legislative efforts to curtail that right.

The Episcopal Women's Caucus concentrates its efforts on promoting a Church that honors and rejoices in the ministries of all women, which would result in a Church that honors and rejoices in the ministries of all people. One aspect of its work is giving visibility and respect to women's perspectives and actions in the work and struggle for justice, peace and the integrity of creation. The Episcopal Women's Caucus strongly opposes the restriction under review in this case.

HADASSAH, THE WOMEN'S ZIONIST ORGANIZATION OF AMERICA

Hadassah, the Women's Zionist Organization of America, founded in 1912, is the largest women's and Jewish membership organization in the United States, with over 300,000 members nationwide. In addition to Hadassah's mission of maintaining health care institutions in Israel, Hadassah has a proud history of protecting the rights of women and the Jewish community. Hadassah is one of the nation's preeminent advocates of women's health issues. Hadassah has a longstanding commitment to staunchly supporting and working to protect a woman's right to choose abortion and other reproductive health care services. Hadassah regards reproductive freedom as a right protected by the First Amendment, which guarantees freedom of religion - the freedom to consult one's own religious beliefs in making a personal choice, free from government interference

JEWISH RECONSTRUCTIONIST FEDERATION

Founded in 1955, the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation (JRF) is the rapidly growing synagogue arm of the Reconstructionist movement, serving 107 congregations and havurot spread across North America. A voice of Reconstructionist Judaism in the greater Jewish world, JRF provides a wide array of services to its affiliates. People experience Reconstructionist congregations as open, inclusive, and egalitarian, both in principle and in practice.

JRF-affiliated communities are autonomous, progressive, and democratic.

Updated from the JRF 1981 statement in support of the Religious Coalition for Reproductive Choice, an organization that JRF is officially affiliated with:

Although the Jewish tradition regards children as a blessing, a gift of life itself, the tradition permits the abortion of an unborn child in order to safeguard the life and physical and mental health of the mother. The rabbis did not take a consistent stand on the question of whether a fetus resembles a "person". They did not think it possible to arrive at a final theoretical answer to the question of abortion, for that would mean nothing less than to be able to define convincingly what it means to be human.

We recognize that abortion is a painful choice. Any prospective parent must make an agonizing decision between competing claims- the fetus, health, the need to support oneself and one's family, the need for time for a marriage to stabilize, responsibility for other children and the like.

Reconstructionist Judaism recognizes that we live in both religious and civic cultures simultaneously. The law of the United States of America supports a woman's right to obtain an abortion, although limitations and restrictions have been applied. The JRF likewise supports the preservation and protection of the reproductive rights of women, and the individual right of women to make the painful decision to abort or not to abort.

JUSTICE AND WITNESS MINISTRIES OF THE UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST

The United Church of Christ, through its primary representative policy-setting body, the General Synod, has since 1971 supported resolutions affirming the legalization of abortion; providing access to full reproductive services, including abortion and information about contraception, for all women regardless of income; and reaffirming support for Roe v. Wade. These resolutions have been affirmed by the General Synod in 1971, 1973, 1977, 1979, 1981, 1987 and 1989. We have based these resolutions on our support for life and the sacredness of life while at the same time recognizing that complex circumstances can be present which can create moral, ethical and religious conflict. Making critical decisions in regards to unintended pregnancies must be primarily the decision of the woman who is pregnant who must wrestle with her religious beliefs, and moral and ethical values.

Justice and Witness Ministries of the United Church of Christ joined an amicus curiae in the case of Stenberg v Carhart, and join this brief for the same reasons. We recognize that the health of a woman who faces lifethreatening conditions during the third trimester of pregnancy should the pregnancy be allowed to continue is of paramount importance. The decision about what appropriate medical intervention, if any, should be taken must be made by the woman and her physician. The decision about what procedure to use, should intervention be called for, must be the decision of the physician whose primary responsibility is to safeguard the life and health of the patient. No law should restrict a doctor from recommending the safest, most medically appropriate procedures.

METHODIST FEDERATION FOR SOCIAL ACTION

The Methodist Federation for Social Action has been in existence since 1907. We have 2,800 members in 34 chapters and are an independent, nation-wide network of United Methodists committed to providing a fruitful witness to the Gospel of Jesus Christ, working primarily through the ministries of the United Methodist Church. Our members work on a wide variety of peace and justice issues including religious liberty, promotion of human rights, non-discrimination, and the empowerment of women. We support reproductive choice.

We affirm the goodness of God's creation and the sacredness of all creation. Therefore, we do not take the question of abortion lightly. We long for a world where abortion is unknown. We envision a world where every child is a wanted child; where family planning and birth control are readily available to and practiced by all the peoples of the world; where adequate nutrition, medical, spiritual, emotional and psychological care is available to all; where meaningful employment and the means to support oneself and one's family are universal; and where adequate prenatal, perinatal, maternal, and child care is available to all. We also recognize that in an imperfect world these goals will never be fulfilled equitably for all people.

Because we regard all life as sacred, we regard the life and well being of the mother-to-be as just as valuable as the potential life of the fetus. We recognize that there are many situations in which more than one of our most deeply held religious and moral values about the sacredness of life will come into conflict with each other. And we recognize that only the individuals most intimately involved in a crisis pregnancy can adequately weigh the factors and values in conflict and come to a decision about the most appropriate course of action. In view of this, we support the right of a woman to choose whether to carry her pregnancy to term, keep her child, give her child up for adoption, or terminate her pregnancy.

The right of reproductive freedom is an issue of religious liberty. Different religious traditions hold widely differing positions on issues related to birth control, pregnancy, abortion, and other issues of reproductive freedom. Because we are guaranteed religious freedom in our Constitution, we believe that reproductive issues must remain free from government interference. We believe that for secular authority to codify any particular religious tradition or position into law is a violation of the religious liberty of all religious traditions whose teachings differ from that law.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF JEWISH WOMEN

The National Council of Jewish Women, Inc. (NCJW) is a volunteer organization, inspired by Jewish values, that works to improve the quality of life for women, children, and families, and to ensure individual rights and freedoms for all through its network of 90,000 members, supporters, and volunteers nationwide. NCJW endorses the protection of every female's right to reproductive choice, including safe and legal abortion, and the elimination of obstacles that limit reproductive freedom. In addition, we believe that religious liberty and the separation of religion and state are constitutional principles that must be protected and preserved in order to maintain our democratic society. Consistent with our priorities and resolutions, NCJW joins this brief.

THE RABBINICAL ASSEMBLY

The Rabbinical Assembly is the international association of Conservative rabbis founded in 1901. Rabbis of the Assembly provide religious leadership for the Conservative movement and serve throughout the world. The Assembly shapes the ideology and practices of the Conservative movement, and administers the work of the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards for the Conservative movement. In 2001, our Law Committee issued a responsum written by Rabbi Avram I. Reisner, ruling that partial-birth abortion is forbidden according to Jewish Law except in the most dire of circumstances. Between the forces of choice who would grant every woman the freedom to abort at will and those pro-life forces who would define life as beginning at conception and ban abortion completely, halakhah (Jewish Law) has championed a bright line conception whereby life begins at birth, but abortion proceeds only for good and sufficient cause. The task of the CJLS is to rule for Jewish women and Jewish pracitioners, not to rule for America.

UNION FOR REFORM JUDAISM

The Union for Reform Judaism (Union), founded in 1873, is the central body of the Reform Movement in North America including 900 congregations encompassing 1.5 million Reform Jews. The Union comes to this issue out of our strong belief in the right of a woman to act in accordance with the moral and religious dictates of her conscience with respect to abortion. While recognizing the right of religious groups whose beliefs differ from ours to follow the dictates of their faith in this matter, we vigorously oppose the attempts to legislate the particular beliefs of those groups into the law that governs us all. Our tradition has always upheld the sacredness of life. Similarly it has upheld the sacredness of the body. Sensitive medical decisions should remain in the hands of women, in consultation with their doctors and on the basis of their own beliefs, without interference from those with political agenda in opposition to established rights. The Reform Jewish Movement opposes laws which would prevent women from choosing to access safe and potentially life-saving medical treatment.

UNITED SYNAGOGUE OF CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM

As affirmed in our 1991 resolution and reaffirmed in 2005, a woman's life and health may mandate the early termination of pregnancy according to Jewish law as determined by the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards (CJLS) and the local rabbinic authority. The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism supports legislation maintaining the legality and accessibility of abortion so that in those cases where our religious authorities determine that an abortion is warranted halakhically, obtaining that abortion will not be hindered by our civil law. The United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism opposes any legislation in the United States or Canada that will hinder an individual's ability to meet a halachic obligation in regard to abortion.

WOMEN OF REFORM JUDAISM

Women of Reform Judaism (WRJ), an affiliate of the Union for Reform Judaism, is the collective voice and presence of women in congregational life. Stronger together, we support the ideals and enhance the quality of Jewish living to ensure the future of progressive Judaism in North America, Israel and around the world. Including over 75,000 women in 500 local groups nationwide, WRJ is deeply committed to the social justice teachings of the prophets and the concept of pikuach nefesh – the "value of life." Serving humanitarian causes, WRJ has adopted resolutions in support of reproductive rights in 1975, 1977, and 1989, and in 1991 WRJ called for support of legislation to provide universal access to health care, including all aspects of reproductive health care, regardless of age and economic status. WRJ has advocated the right of individual women to make decisions regarding abortion based on their conscience and religious beliefs and has opposed efforts, such as the so-called partial birth abortion ban, to redefine or curtail those rights.
